ECONOMIC

COURSE DESCRIPTION

Economics is the study of how economies function and the activities and interactions of economic agents. Microeconomics studies the fundamental components of the economy, such as markets and individual actors, as well as the interactions between them and the results of those interactions. A few examples of individual agents include homes, businesses, purchasers, and sellers. Macroeconomics examines all aspects of the economy, including aggregate output, consumption, savings, and investment, as well as the problems that impact it, such as the use of labor, capital, and land as resources, inflation, economic growth, and governmental policies aimed at resolving these problems.

Economists investigate the distribution of resources used by society to generate commodities and services, including labor, raw materials, land, and machinery. In addition to doing research and gathering and analyzing data, they also keep an eye on economic trends and forecast a wide range of topics, including employment levels, taxes, business cycles, and inflation, interest rates, and currency rates in addition to energy costs.
